901-1000. Soulwork.

After more than three years of daily painting, I'm planning a new and bigger crazy project in the spring. So that means I'll take a hiatus from the daily painting project after my 1000th painting in January.

This project has had many layers, so it's only fitting that I paint it in an entirely new medium. Encaustic paintings are created with dozens of layers of hot wax. It's a slower process, and requires a little patience. It's the perfect way to reflect on the soulwork that has happened throughout this project over the past three and a half years.

Oh! One more thing: If you're using Gmail, they've made some changes-- be sure to drag my email up and over to drop them into the tab that says Primary. Then, when it asks if you want future emails to go into your Primary inbox, just click yes so you can see it in your inbox everyday. I'd hate for you to miss out!

These final thirty paintings are letters and stories of gratitude to you - thanks for being on this journey with me.

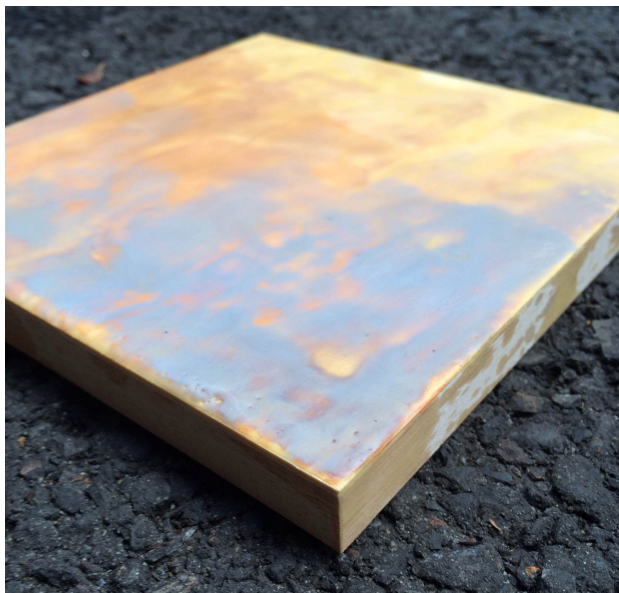

You know that time of day when the light seems to glow? Just before the sun sets and the day ends? I love that moment. Everything is golden, but only for a moment.

I think that's where we are with this project. It's almost the end, but not quite. I still have a few more paintings before the sun fully sets, but we're definitely nearing twilight.

It's Magic Hour.

And another angle.
